Material Landscapes

Conference, 9:30am
Avery 114

Architectural materials produce extended geographies of extraction, waste, and inequality in how they move between sites of extraction and spheres of consumption. These trajectories track the expanded life of buildings and also the power relations that are embedded in colonial and territorial concepts like the periphery, the non-west, and the global south. This symposium brings together scholars who research architectural materials, the people who labor on them, and their social, intellectual, and political histories. Their work interrogates architecture as a system for both producing and addressing historical conditions of climate emergency, inequity, and accumulation.
