SHARON SUTTON

“And what really made the education unique was the commitment of the people who were recruited, but also the revolutionaries who were here, to address the problems in Harlem. And that was part of the Black Power movement. For earlier generations of well-to-do Black students or students who got scholarships into universities, the idea was to sort of distance yourself from the working-class Blacks. But that group of Black Power advocates saw themselves as educating and being part of the Black community.” —Sharon Sutton

In honor of Black History Month, Columbia GSAPP is highlighting Episode #3 from the GSAPP Conversations archive (recorded February 23, 2017), which featured Sharon Sutton M.Arch '73 in conversation with Professor Mabel O. Wilson M.Arch '91 about When Ivory Towers Were Black (Fordham University Press, 2016).

Listen to the episode and read the transcript on the GSAPP website.

COURSE SNAPSHOT

A glimpse into the interdisciplinary course “Immeasurable Cities,” led by Assistant Professor Emanuel Admassu. This course poses the question: How do we measure cities? Students consider multiple forms of measurement, classification, and bordering, that consolidate power and negate the lives of racialized, gendered, and discounted bodies.
