

RUBINSINGER

Beginnings: Born into Fashion

Rubin Singer was born into a family of couturiers, exposed from a young age to refined technique and elegant design. Rubin's grandfather, for whom he is named, was one of the most celebrated designers in the Soviet Union, dressing Russian royalty, Soviet political figures, and the social elite.

His father Alik created costumes for the Bolshoi Ballet and Stanislavski Theater and then moved to Paris where he established an Atelier. Rubin's family heritage in fashion shaped who he is today. As a young man he was not only encouraged to be creatively adventurous but also to be disciplined. The beautiful and enduring designs Rubin executes today are steeped in his heritage and the precise understanding and execution of refined shapes, exact lines and poetic proportions. He employs traditional techniques to achieve cutting edge design.

Early Career: Burgeoning Aesthetics of a Modern Designer

Rubin started his design career as an Associate Designer at Oscar de la Renta and was excited by the dynamic creativity and entrepreneurship that fueled the fashion house. There he learned that responsibility, vision and integrity were foundational qualities to head an iconic fashion brand. He would move on from Oscar to become Head Designer of three Bill Blass licensees, and later the Head Designer of Kai Milla.

All the while, the creative direction for his personal collection was blossoming.

Armed with his vision, passion, mettle, heritage and experience, Rubin Singer launched his eponymous brand that reflects his vision for American couture in 2007.

LVMH, Hermès Battle Shows Culture Clash

By Joelle Diderich

PARIS — France's latest corporate saga has it all: two of the nation's richest families, acrimony and more than a soupçon of snobism. LVMH Moët Hennessy Louis Vuitton's surprise investment in Hermès International has set off a war of words that holds a mirror to French society, which — for all its claims of moderisme and gauchisme — still harbors tensions between the aristocracy and everybody else, up to and including LVMH kingpin Bernard Arnault, the wealthiest man in the country, who, observers agree, is playing a long game aimed at eventually gaining control of Hermès.

Several observers said they were struck by the degree of surprise and indignation expressed when Hermès when LVMH unveiled its investment on Oct. 23. Hermès executives immediately questioned the legality of LVMH's purchase of 17.1 percent of its shares via cash-settled equity swaps.

"Just because it's the luxury sector, are you supposed to wear gloves?" one industry source asked incredulously. "This is no

The Corset Trend Tightens Its Grip, Thanks to Gigi Hadid

Well, it appears that a Victorian-era fashion staple is having an epic comeback. First Sarah Jessica Parker wore a custom Monse corset to this year's Met Gala, then Rihanna was spotted in one out in Santa Monica last week, now Gigi Hadid is the latest celebrity to lace up the waist-cinching look. Once relegated to the lingerie drawer, nowadays the corset has stand-alone power, an underwear-as-outerwear statement piece can be paired with everything from skimpy miniskirts to baggy pants.

Like Victoria Beckham's bustier and trouser ensemble at Cannes, the 21-year-old supermodel's outfit comes with a menswear-inspired twist. Her Rubin Singer top alludes to the skin, while the peplum shape is in keeping with a traditional, and perennially alluring, hourglass silhouette.

RICK OWENS LILIES

Fashion's truest rebel, Rick Owens got his start in the early '90s after dropping out of art school. With his flowing shrouds and architectural leather jackets, he single-handedly defined "minimalist goth." His latest capsule collection, Rick Owens Lilies, features dramatic silhouettes in a muted palette. Though it displays a lighter side of his style, this collection is just as moody, sexy, and mysterious as the rest.

RUBIN SINGER

Fashion is in Rubin Singer's blood. A third-generation designer (his father, Alik designed costumes for the Bolshoi Ballet), he started his career at Oscar de la Renta and then went on to Bill Blass. Launching his namesake collection in 2007, he was able to express his own style. "My clothes celebrate strength, refinement, and an aggressive sensuality," he says. "It's this paradigm of attributes that defines my work and ultimately those who wear it."

There's maybe no New York museum gala as fun and fizzy as the Whitney Art Party. Once a year, the fashion set descends upon the Whitney Museum of American Art for the occasion, drawing out a young crowd, the site boasts ample open bars, a late curfew, and just enough starry names to keep the flashbulbs popping all night. This year, the event was sponsored by BikiniStock and co-chaired by Monroe designers Iremando Garcia and Laura Kim, stylist Michaela Tranger, Natasha Poly, and Zosia Mamet, and attracted additional notable attendees like Hina Bobrow, Ashley Graham, and Victor Cruz. The following night, the kids were at it again, making the trek uptown for Guggenheim International Gala Pre-Party, presented by Dior. While the main gala attracts A-listers in their finest Dior black tie, the pre-party, held the night before, brings out a younger, hipper crowd ready to get down. This year's festivities included a rousing performance by Halsey, who electrified the historical institution, taking to the center of the iconic rotunda in coordinating red looks by the house. Taking in the multi-song set were Kate Mara, Rebecca Hall, Michelle Monaghan, Rebecca Dayan, and more. Here, take a look inside the dueling wild affairs.

Lufthansa Set to Take Off With FlyingLab Featuring See-Now-Buy-Now Rubin Singer Fashion Show

The Lufthansa FlyingLab will also feature talks from Amanda Parkes, chief of technology and research at Manufacture New York, and Heiko Hebig, who heads up strategic partnerships for Northern Europe at Instagram.

CAPTIVE AUDIENCE: Giving the see-now-buy-now phenomenon a twist, Lufthansa has teamed with Rubin Singer to offer a few hundred passengers traveling from Frankfurt and arriving in New York Feb. 9 an in-flight fashion show.

By Rosemary Feitelberg on February 6, 2017

During the nine-hour flight, the designer will suit up models in his spring collection, which travelers can then order through Saks Fifth Avenue, Neiman Marcus or Nordstrom. The 747's main aisle will be used as a catwalk and the upper-deck will become a changing area and makeshift backstage.

An in-flight conference system with six cameras will be installed for better viewing. In what will be a first for an airline, Lufthansa will livestream the show on board so that each guest can view the show on their portable device or laptop via FlyNet, the aircraft's Wi-Fi hotspot. There will also be a second fashion show with Lufthansa's crew wearing various uniforms used by the airline through its 60-year history with a finale of two futuristic designs by Singer. To play up the flashback element, the jumbo jet has been repainted with Lufthansa's signature design from the Seventies.

The doubleheader is part of a fashion and technology-themed Lufthansa FlyingLab that will also feature talks from Amanda Parkes, chief of technology and research at Manufacture New York, and Heiko Hebig, who heads up strategic partnerships for Northern Europe at Instagram. Note the exits, but allow the aisle to be your runway.

Ladies and gentlemen, please stow your bags, take your seats, fasten your seatbelts and prepare for a fashion show.

This was apparently the scene on February 8, when Rubin Singer took his designs to great new heights. Well, 30,000-feet to be exact. The evening wear designer, whose label has been worn by the likes of Gigi Hadid and Beyoncé, decided to use an airplane aisle as his catwalk.

Seriously, the designer boarded a commercial Lufthansa flight, along with a cast of models and staged a full-on runway show on the trip from Frankfurt to New York. A crowd of "German influencers" were on board for the event, but it seems the rest of the plane's passengers were simply in for a very action packed flight. We hope they didn't have plans to catch up on sleep or binge watch episodes of New Girl, as there were two runway shows and a series of three expert talks during the duration of the flight.

Rubin Singer creates glamorous & sophisticated couture

The 38-year-old fashion designer was born with the fashion gene: his father Alik designed costumes for the Bolshoi Ballet in Russia, and his grandfather Rubin, after whom he is named, tailored clothes for Russia's high society.

Born in Vienna, Rubin grew up in Paris and New York. At the age of five, he designed his first dress, for his mother. He studied classical ballet and fine arts at the State University of New York and started his career in fashion working with Oscar de la Renta and Bill Blass. For the last nine years, he has concentrated on his label: Rubin Singer.

Rubin's brand is defined by edgy and sophisticated couture design. Singer cultivates classical craftsmanship but creates proportions, cuts and textures all his own. The

Rubin Singer RTW Spring 2017

The eveningwear designer took a softer, more fluid approach this season.

By Bobbi Queen on September 9, 2016

GALLERIES

Collection

Eveningwear designer Rubin Singer is planning to launch a ready-to-wear collection for fall 2017, one that is not at all about the glam evening looks for which he is known. Somehow, he said, that "made me want to do profound and new dresses and gowns for spring."

"This is a softer, more fluid direction," the designer explained. "I never used this much chiffon in my life." Singer, who shaped the airy silks in a range that included a short slender mint and pink top with paillettes and net-covered second-skin chiffon sleeves over an asymmetric, patchwork leather skirt in the same pastels. He also showed chiffon in more fluid gowns and bell-sleeved minidresses.

Most impressive was how Singer played with potentially tricky effects, controlling and executing them so skillfully that even his harnessed and strapped looks, fabric and leather patchwork, and abundant multicolor paillettes and overlays were rendered beautifully. Mercifully, he said good-bye to over-the-top.

designs lean on structural, manipulated occasionwear, so transitional for him meant varying skirt lengths, softer evening blouses, elegant little capelets, and an air of softness with ruffle-adorned sleeves and soft colors drawn from spring flowers. Standouts included a black and gold embroidery grouping that spoke to a retro ladylike sophistication, an architecturally draped metallic shimmery gown, and new plays on proportion like the dramatic structured sleeves on a coat and the big box pleating on the back of a coatdress. The majority of the collection could be worn by women of any age, but the sexy curve-hugging crocodile, broadtail, or beaded corsets were definitely aimed at a younger clientele looking to spice up their holiday outfits.

Rubin Singer approached resort both pragmatically and sequentially, with a focus on holiday dressing referencing Sixties Neo-noir. Delivery windows to stores are quite vast, after all – from October until spring – so everything has got to be either trans-seasonal or touch on varying weather conditions to remain relevant to customers.

Rubin Singer

Fall marks a season of expansion and experimentation for Rubin Singer. The designer is introducing a sizable collection of evening-inspired ready-to-wear – a natural evolution for his gown-enamored collections.

It's safe to say his propositions are far from traditional fare. Known for his draping and often dramatic structures, separates took on similar features and a focus on variant corsetry. Take, for example, a red minidress with dramatic sleeves on the rack alone, it looked like a piece of welded armor with warrior vibes. Or a long gold lamé jumpsuit with a pointed deep-V corset that served as a gateway piece for gown-leaning customers. Perhaps the piece that best fused Singer's core

Birds of a Feather

Enter late than never. Robin Singer presented his resort collection to select editors Tuesday afternoon at a gorgeous 15,000 sq. foot apartment. We fell in love with the flowy dresses and were stunned at how two patterns could create such diverse design shapes. "All my prints are developed by me and the collection is based on birds of heat, basically tropical and wild birds. They're also based on fauna I researched, developed and then calibrated through different color waves. I mixed in leopard skin to counterbalance the raffish and the softness of everything," explained the designer. "My clothes aren't geared to a specific girl. My woman demands two things—seriousness and decadence, two things I don't think are bound by age or culture or geography, they're more about the makeup of one's self."

Rubin Singer on His Russian Heritage and Landing a Vanity Fair Cover with Kate McKinnon

By Sydney Sadick | November 3, 2017

Coming from a family of couturiers in Russia, designer Rubin Singer was exposed from a young age to refined technique and elegant design. He brought his craft to NYC, where he became an associate designer at Oscar de la Renta and then to Bill Blass, where he was head designer of three Blass licenses, and later the head designer of Kai Millä. When he launched his eponymous label in 2007, he inserted his own name in the evening-wear/red carpet game. Singer breaks down the evolution of his career, landing the fashion credits for Vanity Fair's November cover, and more.

Rubin, when did you realize you wanted to become a fashion designer?

I'm the third generation of Russian fashion designers in my family. I grew up watching my father work, which imbued my understanding and passion for the craft.

How do you maintain your Russian heritage in your designs today?

It's inherent in my design, having grown up watching my father work. From a young age the whole culture and sensibility was taught to me by my parents. Russians are well-known for their flair and drama...and I think I follow in that vein.

You launched your namesake line in 2007. What did working at Oscar de la Renta and your previous roles teach you in this new phase of your career?

Working for Oscar de la Renta taught me how to edit, control, and work with restraint. It truly taught me how to be a professional.

Where do you look for inspiration for your designs?

Everywhere. I've been inspired by the structure of grammar, the film Metropolis, mathematical formulas such as Homomorphism, cultures (i.e. Russia, Japan, Germany) and mythology in my "Vakyries Dominion - Super Bowl Collection" among many others. The brand caters to women and men that transcend age, shape, and demographics. These glamorous, modern clothes empower the people that wear them.
